This issue of Refuge emphasizes gender as a key dimension of the refugee experience.

We begin with a conceptual argument on the importance of gender and suggest the need for qualitative methods to generate action research questions.

We present here a wide range of experiences of refugee women including: the psychological effects of torture, efforts to restructure family life and the search for religious meaning in otherwise shattered lives. Programmes to address problems faced by refugee women are reviewed as well as long-range solutions requiring political lobbying.

It is hoped that such information will sensitize readers regarding the issues and concerns of refugee women, and foster understanding of their plight from different perspectives: individual, institutional, societal and cultural. We hope that this exercise will generate research, programmes and policies that are relevant and sensitive to the needs of refugee women.

Christina Lee
Penny Van Esterik

IN THIS ISSUE:

Editorial: The Trust of the People of Canada
by C. Michael Lanphier and Howard Adelman page 2

Gender: A Key Dimension of the Refugee Experience
by Doreen Indra page 3

Life Histories and Action Research by Penny Van Esterik page 5

Refugee Women in Canada page 6

Programmes in Toronto, New York and Costa Rica page 8

Organizing and Building a Coalition by Christina Lee page 14