The Ideological Conflict between Mainstream and Ethnospecific Agencies

Miranda Pinto and Lydia Sawicki

Abstract

This paper examines the conflict between ethnospecific immigrant serving organisations and so called “mainstream” organisations. The author argues that most of the criticisms raised against ethnospecific organisations are ideologically based and are meant to consolidate the positions of mainstream organisations. Through “neutral policies” such as fiscal restraint, ethnospecific agencies are increasingly peripheralized in the service provision market. This piece concludes that attempts to resolve the conflict have only led to further and wider polarisation.

Précis

Cet article examine le conflit existant entre les organisations assurant des services ciblant des immigrants de groupes ethniqques spécifiques (organisations “ethno-spécifiques”) et les organisations dites “classiques”. L’auteure développe une argumentation selon laquelle la majorité des critiques soulevées contre les organisations ethno-spécifiques sont orientées idéologiquement et visent exclusivement à consolider la position des organisations classiques. Par le biais de “mesures neutres”, comme par exemple les restrictions fiscales, les agences ethno-spécifiques se voient de plus en plus repoussées à la périphérie du marché de la diffusion des services. L’exposé se conclut sur le constat que toutes les tentatives visant à résorber ce conflit ont mené à une polarisation encore plus profonde et plus accusée des groupes en présence.

tation periods occur as immigrants and refugees are expected to be almost instantly self-sufficient, both socially and economically, and well-integrated into Canadian society. In order best to address evolving immigrant and refugee needs, settlement agencies have varying approaches in their program design that accommodate cultural differences and the desperate need for an integrated array of services.

In order to address the conflict arising from the ideological differences between mainstream and ethnospecific agencies in Toronto, this paper begins by discussing the structural differences between the two categories of agencies in terms of size, programmatic and operational characteristics. Next, a comparison of funding sources and proportions is made in order to see where opportunities for loyalties and oppositions can be found in collaborative efforts. This exercise leads us to conclude how ideological differences are at the root of the conflict between these two types of agencies and how the ideological conflict underpins a larger debate about the duplication of services, collaboration between agencies and the long-term goals of assimilation or acculturation.

The structural differences between mainstream and ethnospecific agencies in terms of size, programmatic and operational characteristics are key to our discussion because these specifics establish power differentials in the service provision arena. Mainstream agencies have the advantage of having been longer in the arena and have built up larger agencies that are able to fund a wider array of integrated programs, with superior levels of professionalism. Ethnospecific agencies rise to meet particular settlement needs as they come up and in order to offer culturally-appropriate services, less developed levels of professionalism are prevalent. It is because these agencies possess different strengths that collaboration is a solution to some aspects of the conflict. While new Canadians can potentially access culturally-sensitive counselling and culturally-appropriate programs from ethnospecific agencies, they can also access integrated language, job skills programs and highly-trained professionals. But as funding competition mounts as the result of shrinking budgets and ideologically-backed restructuring, tension around collaborative efforts is becoming the subject of much discussion.

A comparison of funding sources and allocations between the two categories of agencies shows where loyalties and confrontations are founded in the conflict mounting in the service provision arena. Mainstream agencies are more successful in securing larger federal and provincial funding because they have more experience and leverage in offering competitively-integrated programs, often through collaboration with the ethnospecific agencies themselves. These collaborative efforts are marked by tension as a result of the agencies' need to firstly, protect the leverage achieved to date, and secondly, meet the conflicting demands for collaboration and non-duplication of services. The restructuring of the service provision arena requires all agencies to create innovative solutions that require less and less of the shrinking budget as they address growing and changing immigrant and refugee needs. Mainstream agencies not only serve large numbers of new Canadians but they also often attend to the needs of the growing numbers of the country's poor, while scrambling to meet the requirements of government and private funders.

Ethnospecific agencies, on the other hand, feel the impact of funding adjustments and shrinking even more acutely from a disadvantaged position with less structural flexibility and capacity, less experience in the competition and relatively higher costs due to these same characteristics. Further, ethnospecific agencies must also find the larger percentage of their funding from private sources within communities that are themselves usually suffering more severely in the midst of fiscal restraint. At the end of the day, collaborative efforts are more necessary because of government funding demands that these efforts be made, and because the agencies' differing characteristics necessitate collaboration in order to provide the services that new Canadians require upon arrival. The needs must be met and in Canada, NGOs are the only providers of services to newcomers during what is a long integration period.

This analysis leads us to conclude that ideological differences are at the root of the conflict between these two types of agencies because the agencies must structurally, programmatically, and ideologically define their long-term goals of assimilation or acculturation. Funding sources back or challenge the agencies' long-term goals and so far, the restructuring balance sheet has the final word in the conflict. More discussion in the service provision arena must occur in order to address more purposefully the growing levels of tension between the agencies, cries of overlapped service spending and evolving demands for collaboration. We hope that this paper, if nothing else, opens the discussion about the conflict between mainstream and ethnospecific agencies to those involved in those agencies themselves, academics who focus on immigrant and refugee settlement, and government funding agencies.
