A Short Note about "Humanitarian War"

Liam O'Hagan

Abstract

The justification of NATO actions in Kosovo in "humanitarian" terms leads us to examine what exactly is meant by this concept, whose definition is not exactly clear. Indeed, the term suggests something different when used by "humanitarian organizations" such as the ICRC, than when used by state actors. This is not to say that the actions of NATO in Kosovo, which may be better understood in conventional human rights terms, are necessarily invalid. Rather, it is to draw attention to the differing interpretations of the concept, the consequences of which are significant for all involved.

Résumé

La justification des actions de l'OTAN au Kosovo en termes "humanitaires" nous force à examiner qu'est-ce que l'on entend exactement par ce concept, dont la définition n'est pas tout à fait claire. De fait, le terme suggère quelque chose de fort différent lorsqu'il est utilisé par des organisations humanitaires comme le CICR, et lorsqu'il est utilisé par des intervenants étrangers. Il ne s'agit pas d'affirmer que les actions de l'OTAN au Kosovo, qui devraient faire plutôt se concevoir en termes de droits humains conventionnels, sont nécessairement sans validité. Il s'agit plutôt d'attirer l'attention sur une différence d'interprétation d'un concept, dont les conséquences sont significatives pour toutes les parties impliquées.

In the wake of the Rwandan genocide of 1994, much was written about the dangers of humanitarianism being misused as an excuse for political inaction. It was suggested that there was a danger that humanitarian action can become merely "a welcome focal point," and a way of showing that "something is being done," in situations where the international community will not commit the necessary resources toward finding a political solution. It was further argued that the construction of such an event as a "humanitarian disaster" effectively helps to depoliticize it, rendering it a simple case of saving the lives of victims, almost devoid of the broader context.

Five years later, it appears that humanitarianism is again in danger of being misused, but this time as a justification for doing too much. Tony Benn, the British Member of Parliament and a critic of the NATO operations in Kosovo, noted that, "they say that it is a war for humanitarian purposes. Can anyone name any war in history fought for humanitarian purposes? Would the Red Cross have done better with stealth bombers and cruise missiles?"2

In certain respects, this observation is misleading, but only so if one recognizes the confusion that surrounds the discourse of humanitarianism. In fact, Benn is distinguishing the kind of action carried out by the "humanitarian organizations," such as the Red Cross and a variety of humanitarian non-governmental organizations (NGOs), which is far removed from the activities of NATO—and indeed from other cases where state actors have intervened militarily under a "humanitarian banner."

The concept of humanitarianism is in some ways contested, or at least means different things to different people. Larry Minear and Thomas Weiss have argued that "the core meaning of humanitarianism revolves around a commitment to improve the human condition."3 At face value, this would appear to be a fairly broad offer and it is likely that most other "political" or ideological doctrines would claim to offer something similar. In further work by the authors and their wider project of research, the humanitarian imperative is defined as an individual belief that wherever there is human suffering the international humanitarian system must respond, regardless of political considerations.4

For the Red Cross, the principle of humanity is the root of humanitarianism. This principle is defined by Jean Pictet as the sentiment or attitude of someone who shows himself/herself to be human, by which he means someone who is good to his or her fellow beings. Therefore, humanity becomes a sentiment of active goodwill towards humankind.5 The liberal humanist roots of the position have come under examination by some authors, and humanitarianism has traditionally encompassed a whole spectrum of activity; indeed, it has meant different things to different people at different times, and continues to do so.6 Nonetheless, it appears that whatever the philosophical underpinnings of humanitarianism, the term is used most readily, and perhaps most appropriately, in terms of the action of humanitarian organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and a variety of NGOs.

For the humanitarian organizations such as the Red Cross, there is an obvious lack of military enforcement in their action, which suggests that the idea of "humanitarian war" is something of an oxymoron. The Red Cross has an obvious role in terms of international humanitarian law, and relief agencies more generally are seen mostly to specialize in one or more of the five activities of: food distribution, provision of shelter, water, sanitation and medical care.7 The way in which they carry out their work is also governed by a series of principles which help to define these organizations. For the Red Cross, the principles of impartiality, neutrality and independence are perhaps most important. While impartiality supports the aim of providing for all "victims."
a conflict, neutrality seeks to ensure that organizations do not take any side in conflict. This is clearly not the kind of action which NATO is carrying out in Kosovo. The independence principle aims to ensure freedom from the pressure exerted by any other authority, and would ensure a "distance" from organizations such as NATO.8 Such principles are deemed to be crucially important for "humanitarian organizations" in positioning themselves and gaining access for their work. Not all organizations will operate on the basis of these principles and others will interpret them differently. In particular, the neutrality principle is controversial in cases where groups feel that they have to engage more critically with the dynamics of a situation. Kosovo is perhaps a case in point. Nonetheless, however, the differences between this type of action and that of the humanitarian organizations be clearly recognized and demarcated.11

Notes
1. See, e.g., A. Destexhe, foreword to Populations in Danger 1995: A Medicins Sans Frontieres Report (London: M€decins Sans Frontieres, 1995). See also, African Rights, "Humanitarianism Unbound? Current dilemmas facing multi-mandate relief operations in political emergencies," Discussion Paper No.5, November 1994. This report claims that in the light of government-encouraging "humanitarian" projects into their foreign policy, projects are likely to be chosen that best serve countries' "political" objectives. In addition to this, governments use the fact that they help to finance humanitarian organizations projects to try to influence the priorities of these organizations adopting the adoption of policies whose results are likely to suit the state's own particular objectives. See also the report of the Joint Evaluation of Emergency Assistance to Rwanda: "The International Response to Conflict and Genocide: Lessons from the Rwanda Experience," and the Eurostep report, "Lessons from Rwanda: The Argument for a more coherent European Policy on the Great Lakes Region", cited at http://www.oneworld.org/eurostep/greatlak.htm
3. L. Minear, and T. Weiss, Humanitarian Action in Times of War (Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 1993), 7. It is worth noting how the term 'humanitarian' has seldom been delineated with any precision in international law, including, in particular, the Geneva Conventions.
10. The question of relationships with the military and state actors more generally is the subject of much debate within humanitarian NGOs at present.

© Liam O'Hagan, 1999. This open-access work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial 4.0 International License, which permits use, reproduction and distribution in any medium for non-commercial purposes, provided the original author(s) are credited and the original publication in Refuge: Canada’s Journal on Refugees is cited.